ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Many people contributed to the development of the MPICE Framework in a variety of ways. We would like to acknowledge and sincerely thank each and every one. They are too numerous to list in full but their role in developing the MPICE Framework cannot be overstated. We would specifically like to recognize the Office of the Secretary of Defense (OSD) Rapid Response Technology Office for providing the majority of the funding for the effort, and to the US Army Corps of Engineers (USACE) and the US Agency for International Development (USAID) for additional funding to augment the project.

For providing oversight and guidance we would like to thank the Senior-level Steering Committee that was made up of representatives from OSD, Joint Forces Command (JFCOM), Department of State, USAID, USACE, US Institute of Peace (USIP), Office of the Joint Chiefs of Staff (JCS), Army G3 and the Army Peace Keeping and Stability Operations Institute (PKSOI).

Throughout 2006 and into 2007, hundreds of academics, government officials, military personnel, non-governmental organization (NGO) representatives, and other experts and practitioners gathered for working sessions and seminars on all sectors addressed in the Framework. We would like to extend our appreciation to them for their acumen, expertise and perseverance.

Commencing in the summer of 2007, the MPICE Framework was incorporated into JFCOM's Multinational Experiment 5 (MNE5). We express our gratitude for the MNE5 organizational team and to the participants for their assistance in refining the product and identifying changes that would make it more useful to the user community.

In late 2007 the project entered the peer review phase, with reviews taking place at the LBJ School of Public Affairs at the University of Texas, the Carr Center at Harvard University, the Center for Law and Military Operations, and the Naval Postgraduate School. We offer grateful acknowledgment and respect for their valuable comments, suggestions and insights.

We particularly want to highlight the numerous contributions, diligence, alacrity, professionalism and overall support to the MPICE effort of Elon Weinstein of International Sustainable Systems, Dennis Skocz, Rob Grossman and Scott Tousley of Logos Technologies, Inc., Dave Redding of MPRI, Inc and Charlotte Anderholt, our Post-Graduate Fellow from Georgetown University.

FORWARD

There has been a longstanding need for “Measures of Effectiveness,” as they are often called in the private sector, focused on diplomatic, military and development efforts in places prone to conflict. Traditionally, US Government agencies have tended to measure outputs, such as the number of schools built, miles of roads paved, or numbers of insurgents killed. Outputs, however, measure what we do and not what we achieve. Outcomes, or “effects” as they are known in the military’s glossaries, indicate the success or failure of project or mission efforts, since they seek to measure the attainment of conditions that engender stability and self-sustaining peace.

The US government (particularly Department of Defense, US Institute of Peace, US Agency for International Development (USAID) and Department of State) has been actively working with a broad array of partners (multinational, NGOs and academia) to develop new capabilities for stability operations. The Measuring Progress in Conflict Environments (MPICE ‘pronounced ‘M-Peace’) project has developed an overarching framework of indicators that measure outcomes over time and across five sectors (Governance, Economics, Security, Rule of Law and Social Well-Being).

The MPICE foundation was built on the US Institute of Peace Special Report in 2005 (<http://www.usip.org/pubs/specialreports/srs/srs1.html>) that recommended a framework to measure progress toward reducing the means and motivations for violent conflict and building local capacity to resolve conflict peacefully based on the work of the “Working Group on Measuring Progress” with the Center for Strategic and International Studies.

The MPICE Framework also benefited from the National Science and Technology Council’s Regional Stability Interagency Working Group (RSIWG) efforts (see Research and Development Challenges (http://www.ostp.gov/cs/nstc/documents_reports) in Regional Stability and Capacity Building that was co-led by the Research and Development Directorate of the US Army Corps of Engineers (CERD) and the Science and Technology Office at the Department of State (STAS). As part of the Army G3’s Dwight D. Eisenhower National Security Conference Series, the US Army Peacekeeping and Stability Operations Institute (PKSOI) requested CERD and STAS convene an event on metrics for stability operations based on their work with the RSIWG. Capitalizing on USIP’s work, a collaborative effort ensued that recognized gaps in the interagency capability to measure outcomes and effects.

The MPICE Framework is structured around determining conflict drivers and state/society institutional capacity, as conceptualized by USIP (Quest for Viable Peace), the Fund for Peace, and others. The premise states that if conflict stabilization and societal reconstruction is a process continuum spread between violent conflict and sustainable security at opposite ends, viable peace should be considered the middle or “tipping point” where external intervention forces can begin to hand over driving efforts to local forces and capacities. The MPICE Framework is intended to provide monitoring and evaluation assessment teams with a capability to generate substantial insight into conflict environments and gauge progress with respect to this continuum.

PURPOSE

This document constitutes the Measuring Progress for Conflict Environments (MPICE) Framework. The Framework is a hierarchical metrics system of outcome-based goals, indicators and measures. Once collected, the measures can be aggregated to provide indications of trend toward the achievement of stabilization goals over time.

Purpose: To establish a system of metrics that will assist in formulating policy and implementing operational and strategic plans to transform conflict and bring stability to war-torn societies. These metrics provide both a baseline operational- and strategic-level assessment tool for policymakers to diagnose potential obstacles to stabilization prior to an intervention, and an instrument for practitioners to track progress from the point of intervention through stabilization and ultimately to a self-sustaining peace. This metrics system is designed to identify potential sources of continuing violent conflict and instability and to gauge the capacity of indigenous institutions to overcome them. The intention is to enable policymakers to establish realistic goals, bring adequate resources and authorities to bear, focus their efforts strategically, and enhance prospects for attaining an enduring peace.¹

¹ This is the first published version of the MPICE Framework. It will be followed by future updates and refinements, the first of which is anticipated to be November 2008. The MPICE Handbook contains additional documentation and is in the final editing stage.

STAGES OF CONFLICT TRANSFORMATION AND STABILIZATION

STAGE 0 – IMPOSED STABILITY: Drivers of violent conflict persist, requiring the active and robust presence of external military forces, in partnership with a sizable international civilian presence, to perform vital functions such as imposing order, reducing violence, delivering essential services, moderating political conflict, and instituting an acceptable political framework pursuant to a peace accord.

STAGE I – ASSISTED STABILITY: Drivers of violent conflict have been reduced to such an extent that they can be largely managed by local actors and developing indigenous institutions, enabling the reduction of outside military intervention and civilian assistance to levels that can be sustained by the intervening parties over the long term. (Note: Elsewhere this stage has been called viable peace² or sustainable peace).

STAGE II – SELF-SUSTAINING PEACE: Local institutions are able to cope effectively with residual drivers of violent conflict and resolve internal disputes peacefully without the need for an international military or civilian administrative presence. (Note: The Fund for Peace defines this condition as ‘Sustainable Security.’³)

MAJOR MISSION ELEMENTS/SECTORS OF CONFLICT TRANSFORMATION AND STABILIZATION

In devising measures to assess initial conditions and measure progress for each Major Mission Element/Sectors identified above, two issues are paramount:

- What are the motivations or means that drive conflict, and
- What is the capacity of indigenous institutions to resolve conflict peacefully and maintain stability?

METHODOLOGIES

There are a number of data collection and analysis methodologies that can be used with MPICE, including Content Analysis, Expert Knowledge, Quantitative Data and Surveys. These four methodologies are described below and are assigned to the measures in the Framework as recommended means with which to capture data. They are suggestive and not exclusive.

Content Analysis (CA):⁴ Involves surveying media publications in order to gauge popular and/or elite impressions of an issue.

Advantages: Relies on readily available publications; newspapers, in particular, can be important shapers of public opinion.

Disadvantages: Difficult to choose which publications to survey; Labor intensive process of conducting the analysis.

Expert Knowledge (EK): Entails creating a panel of independent, knowledgeable, and experienced experts to assess an issue of interest (e.g. the capacity of law enforcement agencies to perform essential administrative and bureaucratic functions). In this case, a panel of 3-5 experts might be used to observe operations in the field and to report on their quality. The reliability and replicability of the findings depend on specifying the evaluation criteria and data gathering methodology in advance and following them consistently in the field.

Advantages: Experts have the knowledge and expertise to offer informed and useful opinions on a situation and can make sound qualitative judgments in a relatively short period. They may be used to study program documents, interview participants, and make observations in the field. The major costs involved are salaries and travel rather than complicated data-collection procedures.

Disadvantages: Experts may have political agendas to advance; one needs to be wary of relying on a biased sample of experts. It is especially important that the panelists be capable of independent judgment. They cannot be permanent employees of the contracting agency or have a financial stake in the future of the program being evaluated.

Quantitative Data (QD): Utilizes a variety of quantitative data relating to security, standard of living, and economic development, for example, to assess the situation in a country.

Advantages: Statistics can appear to be a more objective way of assessing progress; Provide a useful standard for comparing progress at two different times.

⁴ The Fund for Peace's Conflict Assessment System Tool (CAST) uses content analysis to assess the degree to which drivers of conflict improve or worsen as well as to determine the strength of key institutions (based on three criteria: legitimacy, representativeness and professionalism). CAST scans data from over 11,000 sources (including reports from the media, government and NGOs). CAST currently evaluates a number of rule of law and human rights areas, including the degree of criminalization and corruption of the state and evaluations of the domestic police force, corrections system, and judicial system. CAST can be used for countrywide or province-level analysis.

Disadvantages: Can be difficult to locate reliable indicators of the larger issue one is assessing-- for example, some have argued that number of deaths per month alone is not a particularly good indicator of the strength of the insurgency in Iraq; Statistics are easily manipulated to accommodate a variety of interpretations.

Survey/Polling Data (S/PD): Involves conducting public opinion surveys in order to assess how the public views a variety of issues.

Advantages: Can provide useful general overview of societal views and values; can easily be conducted on a large number of people, which provides more confidence in the findings.

Disadvantages: Surveys must be carefully designed to ensure that the sampled public is representative; poorly worded questions or untrained survey conductors can lead to inaccurate responses.

TAILORING MPICE TO THE ENVIRONMENT

Policy makers will establish the national goals or international mandates to be achieved. Since the goals, indicators, and measures contained in the MPICE Framework are generic in nature, they must be adapted to the specific policy goals, conflict dynamics, and cultural peculiarities relevant to each conflict setting. This process is described in detail in the MPICE User's Handbook. Two salient methodological issues are noted here.

The first issue is the selection of appropriate measures to collect against. There is a requirement to identify which of the over 800 measures are relevant to the particular policy goals and entrenched sources of conflict in each case. This 'down-selection' process entails identifying a manageable number of measures that are of greatest relevance to the conflict environment.

The second issue is to adapt the selected generic measures to make sense in each unique cultural context. Although one of the prominent concerns in crafting the measures was to avoid cultural or western bias, the MPICE Framework cannot claim to have captured the full range of cultural diversity that exists or to be free of unintended biases. One method of addressing any residual bias is the tailoring process. The purpose is to adapt the "down-selected" measures to each cultural context, especially by recognizing that different structures and processes may be used to achieve a given function. The other way to expand the cultural diversity of the measures is to identify any that may have a western bias and modify these in future versions of MPICE. The Western nature of the Framework is therefore recognized by the authors. MPICE is an evolving system of concepts, processes and tools, and so too is this Framework. Recent peer reviews, testing, and fielding of MPICE in stabilization environments have provided the authors with a rare opportunity to continue refining the Framework by drawing in terminology that is more reflective of local, indigenous concepts of governance, security, economy, rule of law and social well being. This will result in a forthcoming version of MPICE that will include measures and metrics that are more accurately reflective of local community standards and ethics (e.g., social cohesion, the importance of local customs, tribal law, local laws, natural resources, belief systems).

TREND

Once collected, the data can be aggregated and analyzed to establish trends over time. Each measure within this Framework has a 'tag' identifying the preferred trend direction:

- ‘+’ indicates the preferred trend is increasing or positive;
- ‘-’ indicates the preferred trend is decreasing or negative;
- ‘d’ indicates that the preferred trend depends on other conditions. These conditions will be fully specified in future versions of the Framework.

The fundamental premise of 'Conflict Transformation and Stabilization' is that sustainable peace is achieved by decreasing drivers of conflict and increasing the performance of institutions to the point that they are able to address and peacefully resolve conflict. The measures are structured in such a way that the majority of drivers should decrease over time and the performance of institutions should increase over time. For example, the Drivers of Conflict goal 'External Destabilization

Diminished', with the indicator 'Do perpetrators of political violence find sanctuary and support in neighboring states?' has three measures (p. 11):

- Presence of perpetrators of political violence from the stabilization, security, transition and/or reconstruction (SSTR) state/region in neighboring countries. (EK)`-
- Refusal by neighboring states to extradite indicted members of armed factions. (EK)`-
- Refusal of neighboring states to take measures to control the common or shared border. (EK)`-

For stabilization to progress, these measures should decline over time.

Similarly, the institutional goal: 'Delivery of Essential Government Services Strengthened', with the indicator, 'Are public expectations for provision of essential public services and utilities being met?' has two measures (p. 13):

- Perception of the quality of life following international intervention (By identity group). (S/PD)`+
- Level of public satisfaction with accessibility of essential government services and utilities. (By identity group) (S/PD)`+

These measures should increase over time.

However, there are some measures that may not be uniformly indicative of progress or deterioration. These measures may be influenced by an intervening variable such as the stage the conflict is in or by influences peculiar to a specific location (e.g. local, regional or national level). Thus these measures, while generally valuable, require an additional degree of interpretation.

For example, the 'Delivery of Essential Government Services Strengthened' goal, with the indicator 'Are the various levels of government capable of providing essential services, utilities and functions?', has a measure:

- Number of essential government functions that are being performed by international actors. (QD)`d

This measure has been tagged as dependant --`d – because it is not a measure of Institutional Performance that is necessarily always desired to trend to the positive or negative. The 'number of essential government functions that are being performed by international actors' is likely to rise throughout the first months after an intervention, and this should not be taken as a negative indicator at that stage. Indeed, the sooner international assistance providers can provide a peace dividend, the better. The subsequent replacement of international service providers by indigenous authorities is unambiguously a positive trend.

The 'Delivery of Essential Government Services Strengthened' goal, with the indicator 'Does a professional civil service exist?', has the measure:

- Perception of the degree of corruption in the civil service. (By identity group)

This measure has been tagged as dependant – ‘d’ – because it is a measure of Institutional Performance that may be influenced by other factors. While normally a reduction in the ‘perception of the degree of corruption’ is desired, there could be an increase that is purely a function of other positive developments. For example, an increase in media attention may be the cause, which itself may indicate actual corruption, perceived corruption or an increased freedom of the press to report on corruption. Another factor might be growing awareness of the government’s responsibilities the public.

Measures tagged with a “d” should be thoroughly assessed to determine what direction indicates progress and under what conditions.
